WHO WON

"It's too bad you aren't entered in the slalom races sponsored by the Teen Club, Chip," purred Melba. "You're such a magnificent athlete and I just know you're a better skier than those others boys." Chip moved his chair over a little closer as he gulped his hot chocolate, soda shop style. "I, er . . . didn't know you thought that much about me, Melba," he glowed. "Why of course I do," smiled Melba. They were suddenly interrupted by, "Cut the conversation, Chip, ole' buddy, Tom and I are here to carry the ball." Bob Maxwell belted Chip on the back as he slid up a chair and the group became four. "Now come on, Maxwell," roared Chip, "this is the first date I've had alone with Melba and I don't go for you guys moving in like this." "Tut, tut," smiled Bob as Melba giggled. "Is that any way to treat two potential winners of this-here-now slalom race this afternoon?"

As Chip's brain started clacking along, Bob boasted that he was the sure winner. Melba was wide-eyed. When Chip inquired about the possibility of his entering the race, Bob brushed him off saying the quota of contestants was complete and since it didn't look like anyone would drop out, Chip's chances were grim. "Oh, I'd just love to go out with the winner," cooed Melba, as Chip's spirits sank lower. Tom perked up at this, then looked sad, "I'd like to come in first, if I could count on that but I'm not that good and . . ." he laughed as he turned his empty pockets inside out, "I'm flat busted right now, anyway." Bob turned to Melba. "Then if you'll date whichever of us wins, consider me your escort for tonight." He got up to leave and turned to the dejected Chip, "Too bad you can't join us old man, ha ha." Tom tagged along and Melba said she had to leave. "Gosh, Melba," protested Chip, "I haven't even had a chance to talk to you." "But, Chip, if I'm to have a date with the winner tonight, I want to decide on what outfit to wear before the race starts at four."

After Melba's departure, Chip rushed around determined to enter the race at the last minute. The officials all told him that his only chance would be to replace another contestant who wanted to drop out. Then he met Tom. Chip did some fast talking and Tom stopped shaking his head. "I guess you're right, Chip," he agreed, "I haven't got a chance of winning, and I could use a couple of bucks to tide me over. So out of the goodness of my heart, I'll let you take my place in this race and I'll race with the less experienced group tomorrow. I'll have a better chance then anyway."

At four o'clock Chip, Bob, and ten other lads were set at the top of the hill to start the downward plunge, weaving and winding around the slalom poles to a speedy finish at the bottom. The spectators were lined up all along the way. "You've got courage, boy," laughed Bob when he spotted Chip. "Never mind, old pal," quipped Chip in return. "I'll give you a run for that date with Melba. She just loves athletes, ya know." They both chuckled good-naturedly. Moments later they were inches apart on the downward drive. Bob was ahead with Chip close behind, and the rest of the group swooping down on them fast.

Chip could sense the exultation of the win, his mind zoomed ahead as he thought of the praise he'd get from Melba. Bob plunged on, the same idea in his mind. The race neared the end, the crowd was tense. Chip was moving up. The two leaders were off in a dream world, as the last slalom pole loomed. Foggily, they took opposite turns . . . collided thumpingly! And both wound up, skis pointing skyward, in a snow bank, while the group swept gloriously past. Chip broke out of the snow bank first, as the Club doctor came running up and helped pull Bob out. "You boys will have to come with me for a check-up, since you can both walk," ordered the doctor. Immediately they both protested, "But doctor, we had plans . . ." "Forget 'em, friends," called Tom from the sidelines. "Melba promised me if neither of you won, she'd date me. Tally-ho!" Chip and Bob looked nambly at each other as Melba waved a fond farewell walking away on Tom's arm!
